To test your familiarity, click to take the Pretest.

Below are the Objectives for this class:

Distribution is an often invisible function in the many stages of transforming raw materials (unprocessed natural products used in manufacturing) into finished products that appear in stores or are used to keep our communities and the economy working.

At the most basic level, those who have products to be used or consumed are suppliers. Those who purchase products to use or consume are customers. Often suppliers do not have the capacity to efficiently reach and serve customers, even if they have the right product to meet customer needs. And customers may not have the resources to seek out and obtain the best products and services to meet their business needs.

Physical distribution is the process by which products move from suppliers at the point of production to customers at the point of use or consumption. Distributors, or companies in the business of distribution, are also responsible for procurement, sales, service, technical assistance and problem solving related to products as well as storage and transportation of products. Distributors serve both suppliers and customers.
